Window awnings cool your home

MARK SALERNO
 Special to QMI Agency

Walls with large windows are great for letting natural light into your home. Energy efficient south-facing windows can even reduce your heating costs in the winter by letting in the sun's warm rays – a concept known as passive solar heating.

However, too much sunshine in the summer months can make your home uncomfortably hot and may increase your air conditioning energy costs. Fortunately, you can control how much sun enters your home with outdoor shading devices such as window awnings and screens.

Window coverings have been used since ancient times to protect against the elements. Interior curtains and blinds were used to protect furniture and carpets from fading, but studies show that they are not effective in keeping the heat out.

Outdoor awnings can protect against sun, rain and snow, and in the early part of the last century both retractable and fixed awnings were a common feature on houses and storefronts. Awnings later fell out of fashion as air conditioners became more common and styles and tastes changed. However, rising energy costs and concerns about the environment have lead to a renewed interest in this "old" technology.

Even on bright sunny days, awnings can reduce interior lighting to the point where homeowners may wish to turn on a light for reading or other activities requiring plenty of illumination. However, the energy used for energy efficient lighting is much less than for interior cooling so you will still save energy overall or you may wish to retract your awning – the choice is yours.

Modern shading devices come in many different designs, styles, colours, and materials, from the conventional fixed aluminum or fibreglass awning to the modern sail style in colourful, water resistant fabric. Retractable awnings are available in a range of designs: lateral arm awnings that can cover large spaces making them especially useful for deck or patio covering; and side or drop arm awnings which can be raised or lowered to cover as little or as much of the window as desired. Retractable awnings are available in manual and fully automated models including designs that detect high winds and retract the awnings before winds can damage them.
